Your result

Socially tuned in (27–35 points)

You generally read the room, communicate clearly, and recover when things get awkward. You likely help conversations feel balanced.

Try this next

Keep checking your assumptions; good social awareness includes asking rather than mind-reading.

Your practical guide

A strengths-based report on the listening, clarity, and awareness that already help you connect well.

1 Your strongest social tools

You likely have a toolkit you underestimate: you read energy shifts, you ask questions that make people feel interesting, you recover smoothly when things get awkward, and you adjust your style without seeming fake. These are advanced skills — many people never develop them deliberately. Name your top three explicitly, because strengths you can name are strengths you can deploy on purpose. Then notice where each shines: the work meeting that needed your read of the room, the new person you put at ease, the tense moment you defused with humor. Social fluency is not a personality trait; it is a set of tools, and yours are sharp.

2 Checking assumptions instead of mind-reading

Your one growth edge is verification: skilled readers sometimes trust their reads too completely. "She seemed annoyed" becomes a fact you act on, when it might have been tiredness, or nothing. Build the checking habit: when you form a strong read, test it lightly before reacting. "You seemed a bit quiet earlier — everything okay?" takes five seconds and prevents hours of miscalibrated behavior. This is especially important in conflict and romance, where the stakes of mind-reading are highest. The goal is not to doubt your perception — it is good — but to hold it as a hypothesis until confirmed. Curiosity beats certainty, even for experts.

3 Adapting without losing yourself

Adaptability is a gift until it becomes disappearance — mirroring every room so well that nobody meets the actual you. Check: do you have opinions people could disagree with, or do you shape-shift to keep everyone comfortable? Do your close friends know what you actually love, or only what you are easy about? Practice selective non-adaptation: state one genuine preference per gathering ("I would rather do the quiet bar than the club"), let one conversation go where you want it to. People connect with specificity, not smoothness. You already know how to make everyone comfortable; now make sure someone in the room is you.
