

YOUR FULL REPORT

Are you controlling?

Control is affecting trust

Score band: 27–35 points · Relationships

What this report covers

A trust-rebuilding guide for repeated monitoring, pressure, or difficulty accepting another person's choices.

Inside:

1. Control behaviors to stop now
2. Replacing surveillance with direct communication
3. Restoring privacy and independent choice

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

Control is affecting trust (27–35 points)

Your answers suggest repeated pressure, monitoring, or difficulty accepting 'no.' This can make people less honest with you, not more secure.

Try this next

Stop one monitoring or pressure behavior immediately and replace it with a direct request that allows a real no.

Your practical guide

A trust-rebuilding guide for repeated monitoring, pressure, or difficulty accepting another person's choices.

1 Control behaviors to stop now

Some behaviors need to stop immediately, not gradually — because each instance does active damage. Stop checking their phone, location, or messages. Stop issuing ultimatums disguised as concern. Stop punishing "wrong" choices with withdrawal, coldness, or anger. Stop making unilateral decisions about shared money, plans, or relationships. Write your own list from your quiz answers and put it where you will see it. These are not communication habits to refine; they are control tactics, and naming them as such is not self-attack — it is the honesty that makes change possible. Every day without them is evidence you can live differently.

2 Replacing surveillance with direct communication

Surveillance is a counterfeit of communication: it gets you information while destroying the conditions for honesty. Replace each monitoring behavior with a direct conversation. Instead of checking their location, say: "I feel anxious when I do not know your plans — can we agree on a check-in that works for both of us?" Instead of reading messages, say: "I have been feeling insecure about us, and I want to talk about it rather than snoop." These conversations are harder than checking — that is the point. They require vulnerability instead of power, and they give the other person a chance to respond as a partner rather than a suspect. Expect discomfort; do it anyway.

3 Restoring privacy and independent choice

Trust is rebuilt through restored privacy and independent choice, visibly and over time. Practical steps: hand back the passwords and tracking access without being asked; stop commenting on choices that are theirs to make — what they wear, who they see, how they spend their own money; when they make a decision you dislike, practice the sentence "that is your call, and I support you" until it feels less like swallowing glass. Do not announce your progress seeking credit — let them discover the change. And if they need space or boundaries while deciding whether to trust you again, respect that fully; their caution is data about the damage, not an attack on your growth.