

YOUR FULL REPORT

Are you the coworker nobody likes?

Your team may be compensating

Score band: 27–35 points · Career

What this report covers

A reputation-repair plan for patterns that may be making the team compensate around you.

Inside:

1. Your likely collaboration costs
2. A feedback conversation script
3. Thirty days of visible follow-through

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

Your team may be compensating (27–35 points)

Your answers suggest coworkers could be managing around your interruptions, mood, blame, or inconsistency.

Try this next

Ask a trusted coworker for one behavior that would make collaboration easier—and do not defend yourself.

Your practical guide

A reputation-repair plan for patterns that may be making the team compensate around you.

1 Your likely collaboration costs

Your collaboration costs are probably specific and visible: people route around you, double-check your work, brace for your reactions, or exclude you from the informal conversations where real decisions get made. These are expensive — for them and for your career, since advancement runs on trust as much as talent. Get precise about your costs by asking one brave question of a trusted colleague: "What is it like to work with me when I am stressed?" Listen to the answer without defending; it is the most valuable professional feedback you will ever receive. The costs you can name are the costs you can cut.

2 A feedback conversation script

Have the feedback conversation before it becomes a performance review. The script, delivered privately to your manager or a trusted peer: "I want to be easier to work with, and I would value your honest take — what is one thing I do that makes collaboration harder?" Then the critical part: receive it without defense. "Thank you, that is helpful" — even if it stings, even if you disagree. Ask one clarifying question, not five. End with a specific commitment: "I am going to work on X, and I would appreciate a nudge if you see it." This conversation is terrifying and transformative; most people never have it, which is exactly why having it sets you apart.

3 Thirty days of visible follow-through

Thirty days of visible follow-through rewrites a reputation faster than any apology. Pick the two behaviors from your feedback and make them conspicuously consistent: if it was reliability, every deadline met early with a confirmation; if it was tone, every interaction warm and every email re-read before sending; if it was listening, visibly taking notes and following up on others' points. Keep a private log — not for credit, for consistency. Do not announce the campaign; let people discover it. Around week three, check in with your feedback source: "How am I doing on X?" Reputations are just patterns people have noticed; give them a new pattern to notice.