

YOUR FULL REPORT

Do you show narcissistic traits?

Traits may be straining relationships

Score band: 27–35 points · Personality

What this report covers

A focused plan for recurring empathy, equality, or accountability problems that may be straining relationships.

Inside:

1. Patterns others may experience
2. Building real reciprocal attention
3. Questions to bring to therapy

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

Traits may be straining relationships (27–35 points)

Several answers point to recurring difficulty with empathy, equality, or accountability. A therapist can help unpack what protects and reinforces these habits.

Try this next

Track one week of moments when you feel overlooked. What do you do next, and what does it cost?

Your practical guide

A focused plan for recurring empathy, equality, or accountability problems that may be straining relationships.

1 Patterns others may experience

It helps to hear, plainly, what the pattern may feel like from the other side: conversations that orbit your needs, achievements discussed more than asked about, apologies that explain more than they own, feedback met with coldness or counterattack, and a subtle sense that love and attention are conditional on admiration. People rarely say this to your face — they withdraw, go careful, or leave. If multiple relationships show the same distance, the common factor is worth examining without the usual defenses. This is not a verdict on your worth; it is information about your impact, and impact is the only thing other people actually experience.

2 Building real reciprocal attention

Reciprocal attention is built through deliberate, even mechanical practice at first. Try the 2:1 rule in conversations: two questions or acknowledgments about them for every one statement about you — and mean the questions. Practice reflective listening: "It sounds like that promotion meant a lot after the year you have had" — no pivot to your own story. Keep a private log for two weeks: after significant interactions, note whose inner life got more airtime. The goal is not self-erasure; it is balance. Genuine curiosity about others is a skill, and like any skill, it feels artificial before it feels natural. The artificial phase is not fakeness — it is learning.

3 Questions to bring to therapy

Bring these questions to a therapist experienced with narcissistic patterns or personality-level work: What am I protecting when I get defensive — what feels unsurvivable about being wrong or unseen? Where did I learn that admiration equals safety? What would it cost me to let someone matter more than my image in a specific moment? A good therapist will neither flatter nor shame you; they will help you see the machinery. Look for someone who does more than validate — you want challenge with compassion. This work is some of the hardest personal growth exists, and the fact that your answers brought you here suggests you are already doing the bravest part: looking.