Your result

It may be time to leave (36–45 points)

Your answers point to sustained strain and very little restoration. You do not have to quit today, but treating this as normal could keep shrinking your options.

Try this next

Choose a safe timeline, protect your income, and take one concrete step toward another role.

Your practical guide

A grounded plan for leaving a role that appears to be eroding your energy and sense of possibility.

1 Why ordinary rest is not fixing it

When ordinary rest stops working — weekends do not restore you, vacations end and the dread returns by Tuesday, sleep does not touch the exhaustion — the problem is not your recovery habits. It is the source. This distinction matters because it ends the self-blame: you are not bad at resting, and another productivity system will not fix it. Prolonged work distress shows up physically (headaches, stomach issues, getting sick constantly), emotionally (numbness, irritability, crying at small things), and cognitively (inability to focus, dread that feels like grief). If you recognize yourself here, stop trying to optimize your way out of a situation your body has already voted on.

2 A safe transition timeline

Build a transition timeline with actual dates — vagueness is how people stay stuck for years. A workable frame: this month, finances and resume; next 60 days, active searching with a weekly quota; a target exit window, even a rough one ("by spring"). Include the safety rails: the minimum savings that lets you leave, the bridge income options, the people who will be references. Tell one person the timeline — saying it out loud makes it real. And build in the non-negotiable: you leave by the date even if the perfect role has not appeared, via a good-enough move, because "perfect or nothing" is how timelines die. A plan with dates is a decision; a plan without them is a wish.

3 How to protect health while you move

While you move, protect your health like it is the project — because it is. The transition period is when people get sick, stop sleeping, and numb out, which then sabotages the search. Non-negotiables: sleep protected like a meeting, movement daily even if it is just walking, one person who knows the real story, and a hard limit on numbing (the drinking, the scrolling, the whatever that takes the edge off and adds interest). If distress is severe — panic, depression, inability to function — talk to a doctor or counselor now, not after the transition. You are not just changing jobs; you are recovering from something. Treat the recovery as seriously as the job hunt.
