Your result

Ordinary tired (0–13 points)

Your answers look more like recoverable fatigue than a deep burnout pattern. Rest and a lighter stretch may genuinely help.

Your practical guide

A recovery guide for ordinary work fatigue before it grows into something harder to reverse.

1 Your current energy drains

Name your current energy drains specifically — tiredness with an address is solvable, vague exhaustion is not. Common drains: sleep debt (the most underestimated performance drug), the mental load of juggling everything, specific people or tasks that cost disproportionate energy, physical deconditioning, or decision fatigue from a thousand tiny choices. List yours in order of size. Then notice which are structural (the job, the caregiving) versus fixable (the 1am scrolling, the skipped lunches). You cannot fix structural drains this week, but fixable ones are low-hanging energy — and reclaiming them first gives you fuel for the bigger questions.

2 Rest that actually restores

Rest that actually restores is specific, and it is probably not what you are doing. Scrolling is not rest — it is stimulation wearing rest's clothes. Real restoration: sleep (consistent schedule beats duration hacks), true breaks during the day (away from screens, ideally moving or outside), one full day off weekly from obligations, and the particular rest you personally need — solitude for introverts, connection for extroverts, play for the over-serious, stillness for the over-stimulated. Audit your week: how much genuine restoration is actually in it? Most tired people discover the answer is near zero. Add one real rest block this week, protect it like a meeting, and notice the difference.

3 Boundaries that keep tiredness temporary

Boundaries keep tiredness temporary — without them, ordinary fatigue ferments into something worse. The essential three: a work end-time that holds (the laptop closes, the notifications go off), a protected sleep window (non-negotiable, even on weekends), and one weekly white space — unscheduled hours where nothing is owed to anyone. Communicate boundaries once, briefly, then enforce them without apology or over-explanation. "I am offline after 7" needs no justification. Watch for boundary erosion disguised as virtue (the extra project, the "quick favor") — every yes to the draining is a no to recovery. Tired is a signal; boundaries are how you answer it before it becomes a condition.
