Your result

Fully in the story (27–35 points)

You are showing up for your life with curiosity and purpose. You can hold hard chapters without treating them as the ending.

Try this next

Keep the story dimensional: rest and ordinary days belong in a good life too.

Your practical guide

A strengths report on the curiosity and purpose that already keep you present in your own life.

1 Your strongest main-character habits

Your strongest main-character habits are probably things you do without naming them: you make decisions rather than drifting, you invest in your own growth, you curate your life deliberately, you treat your time as valuable. These are the habits that separate protagonists from background characters — not drama, but agency. Name your top three and protect them like the plot depends on it, because it does. Then add one: the habit your next-level self would have. Main-character energy is not a personality trait; it is a set of practices. Yours are working. Keep working them, and keep adding.

2 Keeping hard chapters dimensional

Keeping hard chapters dimensional means refusing the single-story version of difficulty: the setback is not the whole plot, the bad month is not the theme, the failure is a chapter, not the title. Protagonists are defined by how they move through hard chapters, not by avoiding them. The practices: narrate the difficulty honestly without letting it narrate you ("this is hard" not "my life is hard"); find the agency inside it (what can you choose, even here?); keep one thread of the larger story alive (the project, the friendship, the practice that continues). Dimensional characters have bad chapters. Flat characters let bad chapters define them. Stay dimensional.

3 A next-season intention

A next-season intention gives the current momentum a direction: not a resolution, an intention — the theme of your next chapter. It might be "build," "brave," "rest," "connect," "create," or your own word. Choose it deliberately, write it where you will see it, and let it filter decisions: does this serve the intention? The power of a season intention is that it turns scattered good choices into a coherent arc. You are fully in the story now — the question is what the next season is about. Choose the theme. Then live like the protagonist who chose it, one intentional scene at a time.
