Your result

The people-centered guide (14–26 points)

You tend to notice needs, translate complexity, and help others move forward. Client service, teaching, healthcare, HR, community work, or coaching may feel natural.

Ask whether a role rewards listening and relationship-building—not only output volume.

Your practical guide

A work-fit profile for people energized by trust, service, and helping others make progress.

1 Your relationship strengths

Your relationship strengths are career capital: you likely build trust quickly, read what people need before they articulate it, defuse tension without taking sides, and make others feel genuinely heard. These are not soft skills — they are the skills that determine whether teams function, clients stay, and organizations hold together. Name your specific gifts: are you the translator who makes experts understandable, the steady presence in crises, the mentor who develops people, the bridge between warring departments? Precision here matters, because "good with people" is invisible on a resume while "de-escalated client conflicts and retained three key accounts" is a career.

2 People-centered role families

People-centered role families where your strengths compound: counseling and coaching, teaching and training, healthcare's relational side (nursing, therapy, patient advocacy), customer success and account management, human resources done well, community building, nonprofit program work, hospitality leadership. Within any industry, favor the roles where relationships are the work rather than the obstacle to it. When comparing options, ask: does this role get better as trust deepens, or does it burn through people? You want the former — careers where your relational capital appreciates, not ones that spend it.

3 Boundaries that prevent overgiving

The occupational hazard of your strengths is overgiving — absorbing everyone's problems, saying yes until you are empty, confusing being needed with being valued. Boundaries are career infrastructure for you, not selfishness. Practice the sustainable yes: "I can help with that Thursday" instead of dropping everything; the referral instead of the rescue ("our EAP counselor is excellent for this"); the end-of-day cutoff that protects tomorrow's care. Watch for the martyr warning signs: resentment toward the people you help, exhaustion you wear as identity, needs of your own that never get voiced. You cannot pour from an empty cup, and the people you serve deserve the full one.
