

YOUR FULL REPORT

Are you carrying unprocessed trauma?

Few current signs

Score band: 0–13 points · Relationships

What this report covers

A grounding guide for preserving the routines and relationships that help your body recognize present-day safety.

Inside:

1. Your current protective strengths
2. Stress signals worth noticing early
3. A personal calm-maintenance plan

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

Few current signs (0–13 points)

Your answers do not show many active trauma-related patterns right now. That does not confirm or erase any past experience; it only reflects how things feel today.

Try this next

Keep the supports and routines that help your body recognize safety.

Your practical guide

A grounding guide for preserving the routines and relationships that help your body recognize present-day safety.

1 Your current protective strengths

Your current protective strengths are worth naming: you likely have routines that regulate you, relationships that steady you, and a basic sense that your body and mind are on your team. These are not small things — they are the infrastructure of resilience, and many people build them only after hard lessons. Notice what specifically works: the morning walk that settles you, the friend who can hear the real answer, the way you talk yourself through stress. Write the list down somewhere you will find it on a bad day. Strengths you have catalogued are strengths you can reach for deliberately instead of hoping they show up.

2 Stress signals worth noticing early

Even steady systems have early-warning signals, and catching them early is a skill. Yours might be: sleep getting thin, irritability over small things, avoiding something you normally enjoy, a shorter fuse with people you love, or your body holding tension in its usual places. Treat these as dashboard lights, not failures — information arriving in time to act on. When you spot one, respond with the smallest effective intervention: an earlier bedtime, a walk instead of scrolling, naming the stress out loud to someone. Early signals are a gift; they mean your system is communicating before it has to shout.

3 A personal calm-maintenance plan

Build a personal calm-maintenance plan while things are good — that is when the planning works. Write down your top three regulators (the walk, the call, the breathing exercise), your two early-warning signals, and your one person to contact if signals persist more than a couple of weeks. Keep it on your phone, not just in your head. Review it seasonally, because what regulates you can change. This is not pessimism; it is the same logic as keeping a spare tire. Maintenance plans are how steady stays steady, and creating one now is a quiet act of care for your future self.