

YOUR FULL REPORT

Are you the coworker nobody likes?

A reset is overdue

Score band: 36–45 points · Career

What this report covers

A direct accountability guide for rebuilding trust after repeated friction, blame, or disrespect.

Inside:

1. What must change first
2. Owning impact without excuses
3. How consistency repairs a reputation

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

A reset is overdue (36–45 points)

Several frequent habits here can make a workplace feel tense or unfair. Reputation changes through repeated behavior, not one big apology.

Try this next

Own one pattern, name the new behavior, and let consistency—not promises—prove the change.

Your practical guide

A direct accountability guide for rebuilding trust after repeated friction, blame, or disrespect.

1 What must change first

What must change first is whatever your colleagues would name if asked anonymously — and you probably know what it is. The usual candidates at this level: unreliability that forces others to cover, hostility or contempt that makes people dread interactions, credit-taking, chronic negativity, or behavior that crosses into bullying. Pick the single most damaging one and treat it as non-negotiable starting today, not Monday, not after the project. Tell your manager plainly: "I know X has been a problem, and I am changing it starting now." Public commitment creates accountability that private resolve cannot. One behavior, stopped completely and visibly, is worth more than five improved slightly.

2 Owning impact without excuses

Owning impact without excuses means retiring your three favorite defenses. "I was stressed" — everyone is stressed; it explains, it does not excuse. "That is just how I am" — then change how you are, or accept the consequences. "They are too sensitive" — the impact is the impact regardless of their sensitivity. The ownership script: "I did X, it affected you by Y, and I am changing Z — no excuses." Deliver it to the people most affected, individually, without asking for reassurance. Some will not forgive you quickly; that is their right and your information. Excuses protect your comfort; ownership rebuilds your career. Choose accordingly, every time.

3 How consistency repairs a reputation

Consistency repairs reputations on a timeline you must respect: weeks to be noticed, months to be believed, a year to be trusted again. The practices that get you there: radical reliability (under-promise and over-deliver, every single time), proactive communication (no surprises, ever — bad news early beats bad news late), and visible generosity (credit others publicly, help without being asked, mentor someone). Document your own consistency privately so discouragement does not derail you in month two when nobody has noticed yet. And if the environment is too poisoned for repair — if you have genuinely changed and the label will not lift — a fresh start elsewhere, with the lessons intact, is a legitimate strategy, not an escape.