

YOUR FULL REPORT

Are you the coworker nobody likes?

A solid teammate

Score band: 0–13 points · Career

What this report covers

A strengths report on the habits that already make you a trustworthy and low-drama teammate.

Inside:

1. What coworkers can rely on
2. Keeping communication clean
3. How to use your credibility

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

A solid teammate (0–13 points)

You appear dependable, respectful, and reasonably easy to work with. You do not need to be everyone's friend to create trust.

Try this next

Thank one coworker specifically for something their work made easier.

Your practical guide

A strengths report on the habits that already make you a trustworthy and low-drama teammate.

1 What coworkers can rely on

Coworkers can rely on you for the unglamorous virtues that actually run workplaces: you do what you say, you communicate before problems become surprises, you treat support staff with the same respect as executives, and your mood does not become everyone else's weather. These qualities are rarer than talent and more valuable than brilliance — teams will choose the reliable colleague over the brilliant flake every time. Notice which of these is most "you": the follow-through, the calm under pressure, the fairness, the humor that defuses. Knowing your workplace reputation's foundation lets you build on it deliberately instead of taking it for granted.

2 Keeping communication clean

Clean communication is mostly about what you do not do: no gossip dressed as concern, no vague "we need to talk" messages that spike anxiety, no feedback delivered as a drive-by, no commitments made vaguely and kept optionally. The positive version: say the thing directly and kindly ("I need the draft by Thursday to stay on schedule"), confirm in writing what was decided, give feedback privately and specifically, and close loops ("done," "on it," "need until Friday"). These habits are invisible when present and glaring when absent. Audit your last week against this list — the gaps you find are the cheapest reputation upgrades available.

3 How to use your credibility

Credibility is capital — spend it on things that matter. Use it to advocate for good ideas that need a champion, to give honest feedback upwards that others are afraid to give, to mentor the new person everyone is too busy for, to push back on a bad decision with the weight your track record carries. Do not spend it on gossip, credit-stealing, or office politics; credibility spent there converts to its opposite. Also, lend it: publicly crediting colleagues ("Priya's analysis made this work") costs you nothing and builds the kind of social capital that compounds. The most respected people in any workplace are the ones who use their standing for others.