

YOUR FULL REPORT

Do you have toxic habits?

A few sharp edges

Score band: 14–26 points · Personality

What this report covers

A practical look at the defensive habits that appear when you feel criticized, left out, or stressed.

Inside:

1. Your likely triggers and early warning signs
2. How to replace guilt, comparison, and defensiveness
3. Simple repair language that does not make excuses

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

A few sharp edges (14–26 points)

You may have some protective habits—defensiveness, comparison, or indirect pressure—that show up under stress. A pattern can cause harm without making you a bad person.

Try this next

Pick the one answer that made you most uncomfortable and notice it for one week without judging yourself.

Your practical guide

A practical look at the defensive habits that appear when you feel criticized, left out, or stressed.

1 Your likely triggers and early warning signs

Your sharp edges probably have a schedule. Most people with this result notice their defensiveness spikes in predictable places: performance reviews, disagreements with a partner, group chats where they feel left out, or late evenings when patience is gone. Start mapping yours. For one week, jot down each moment you felt criticized or compared — who was there, what was said, what you did next. You are looking for the ten seconds before the reaction: the tightened jaw, the mental scorecard, the sudden urge to change the subject or go quiet. Once you can name the trigger in real time ("I feel criticized, so I want to deflect"), the reaction loses half its power.

2 How to replace guilt, comparison, and defensiveness

Three habits do most of the damage at this level, and each has a direct replacement. Guilt as leverage ("after everything I do for you") becomes a clean request: "I need help with this — can you take Saturday?" Comparison ("at least I don't...") becomes ownership of your own part only. Defensiveness — explaining your intent before acknowledging impact — becomes a two-sentence pause: "I hear that hurt. Tell me more before I respond." None of these require you to agree with the criticism. They only require you to let the other person's experience exist for a minute before you manage it. Practice the replacements out loud once; awkward rehearsal beats smooth damage.

3 Simple repair language that does not make excuses

A repair that works has three parts and no "but." First, name the specific behavior: "I mocked your idea in front of everyone." Second, name its impact without guessing their feelings for them: "That could make it harder to speak up around me." Third, state the concrete change: "I will disagree privately from now on." Then stop talking — do not ask for reassurance that you are forgiven. If they are not ready, say "I understand" and let your follow-through do the rest. One clean apology like this repairs more trust than ten vague ones, because it proves you actually saw what happened.