

YOUR FULL REPORT

Are you being a bad friend?

Friendship needs repair

Score band: 36–45 points · Relationships

What this report covers

A direct repair guide for patterns that can make friendship feel one-sided, unsafe, or exhausting.

Inside:

1. What to own without excuses
2. A specific trust-repair conversation
3. When to respect distance or an ending

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

Friendship needs repair (36–45 points)

Several frequent behaviors here can make friendship feel unsafe or one-sided. Owning the pattern directly is kinder than promising to 'be better' without a plan.

Try this next

Pick one friendship worth repairing and ask what specific behavior has been hardest for them.

Your practical guide

A direct repair guide for patterns that can make friendship feel one-sided, unsafe, or exhausting.

1 What to own without excuses

Owning it starts with specificity, not self-flagellation. "I have been a bad friend" invites reassurance; "I canceled three times, I only call when I need something, and I was dismissive about your divorce" invites actual repair. Write the honest list privately first — the missed milestones, the one-sidedness, the moments you knew you were wrong and stayed quiet. Then separate what was capacity (you were genuinely drowning) from what was choice (you just did not bother). Capacity deserves explanation; choice deserves ownership without excuses. People can forgive either, but they can only trust the version where you know the difference.

2 A specific trust-repair conversation

Choose the one friendship most worth repairing and have the conversation in person or by voice — not text. The script: name the specific pattern ("I have treated this friendship as one-directional for months"), acknowledge the impact ("you must have felt taken for granted"), state what changes concretely ("I am going to check in weekly and actually show up — starting with your birthday dinner, which I will not miss"), and ask what they need ("is there something specific I should know I got wrong?"). Then accept their response, even if it is anger or distance. One conversation opens the door; only months of different behavior walk through it.

3 When to respect distance or an ending

Some friendships cannot or should not be repaired, and respecting that is also accountability. If they need distance, say so plainly: "I understand, and I am sorry it came to this. If you ever want to reconnect, I would welcome it." Do not chase, guilt, or demand a verdict — that repeats the pattern. If the friendship is ending, grieve it honestly rather than rewriting history to make yourself the victim. And if you notice this is a recurring cycle across friendships, that is worth exploring with a counselor: sometimes a friendship pattern is really a life pattern wearing a social disguise. Endings, handled with grace, teach you how to begin better.