Your result

Capable but uneven (14–26 points)

You have several useful skills, though nerves or certain settings may disrupt them. Focus on one pattern rather than trying to become 'better at people' all at once.

After a conversation, note one cue you read correctly—not only what felt awkward.

Your practical guide

A targeted guide for strengthening the situations where nerves or uncertainty make your skills less consistent.

1 Your uneven social moments

Uneven usually means situational: fine with friends, shaky with strangers; good one-on-one, lost in groups; confident at work, awkward at parties. Map your terrain honestly — list three settings where you are comfortable and three where you are not, and look for the pattern. Often it is stakes (fear of judgment), structure (unstructured mingling is hardest), or energy (evenings after long days). This matters because the fix is targeted, not total: you do not need to "become better at people," you need a plan for the specific settings that wobble. Confidence built in one hard setting transfers faster than generic advice ever does.

2 Scripts that reduce pressure

Scripts reduce pressure because they move words from improvisation to preparation. Build a personal set: three openers, two follow-up questions ("what got you into that?" works almost anywhere), one story about yourself you can tell well, and one exit line. Rehearse them aloud — in the car, in the shower — until they feel boring, because boring means automatic. Then deploy them deliberately: this week, use the follow-up question in every conversation. Scripts are not fake; they are scaffolding. Every socially fluent person you admire once leaned on phrases they had practiced. The scaffolding comes down on its own once the building stands.

3 A practice ladder for real settings

Climb a practice ladder, one rung per week, from easy to genuinely hard. Rung one: small talk with a cashier or barista. Rung two: one comment to a coworker you do not know well. Rung three: attending something social for just thirty minutes, with permission to leave. Rung four: starting a conversation with a stranger at an event. Rung five: hosting or initiating plans yourself. The rule: stay on each rung until it feels dull, not just survivable — boredom means mastery. If a rung spikes panic rather than nerves, split it smaller. You are not testing courage; you are building evidence that each level is safe.
