Your result

Warming up (14–26 points)

You have some approachable habits, but they may not show consistently. Stress, self-consciousness, or a habit of self-protection could be muting your warmth.

Try this next

Pick one simple signal—eye contact, a warm greeting, or keeping a small promise—and make it reliable.

Your practical guide

A practical guide to making your existing warmth more consistent across new, stressful, and group settings.

1 Where your social warmth gets muted

Your warmth is real but inconsistent — strong with close friends, muted with everyone else. The muting usually happens in three settings: new people (you wait to be sure they are safe), groups (you go quiet rather than compete for airtime), and stressful moments (your face goes neutral while your mind races). None of this means you are unfriendly; it means your warmth has conditions. Identify your strongest mute setting and run one experiment there: with new people, offer one small disclosure first ("I am new to this group too"); in groups, aim for one contribution rather than constant presence. Consistency in one setting generalizes faster than you expect.

2 Reliable habits that build comfort

Comfort is built from small, repeatable signals. Adopt three and use them everywhere: the two-second greeting — eye contact, a smile, their name — when you arrive anywhere; the bridge question — "what has been the best part of your week?" — which gives people something good to talk about; and the specific compliment, given once and then dropped ("that color looks great on you," then move on, no hovering). These work because they are predictable: people relax around those whose warmth they can count on. Track it simply — each evening, note whether you used all three. Within two weeks the pattern starts running on its own.

3 How to stop over-monitoring yourself

Over-monitoring — replaying everything you said, scanning faces for disapproval — is warmth's quiet killer, because all your attention goes inward instead of toward the other person. Interrupt it with a redirect rule: when you catch yourself reviewing your performance mid-conversation, ask the other person a question instead. Curiosity is incompatible with self-surveillance; you cannot interrogate yourself and genuinely listen at the same time. Afterward, replace the replay with one fact: "I asked about her trip and she lit up." Judge single moments, not your entire social identity. Most people are far too busy monitoring themselves to be grading you.
