

YOUR FULL REPORT

Are you burned out—or just tired?

Burnout signs are building

Score band: 27–35 points · Career ●

What this report covers

A burnout-aware plan for reducing demand and asking for meaningful support.

Inside:

1. Emotional and physical warning signs
2. A workload conversation outline
3. When professional care may help

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

Burnout signs are building (27–35 points)

Emotional depletion, detachment, or reduced effectiveness appear to be affecting daily life.

Try this next

Talk with someone who can change workload or expectations, and consider a health professional if symptoms persist.

Your practical guide

A burnout-aware plan for reducing demand and asking for meaningful support.

1 Emotional and physical warning signs

Burnout's warning signs cluster in three domains — check all three honestly. Emotional: dread, detachment, cynicism about work you once cared about, irritability at small things, feeling ineffective. Physical: exhaustion sleep does not fix, frequent illness, headaches, stomach issues, the wired-but-tired feeling. Cognitive: inability to concentrate, decision paralysis, memory lapses, a sense of unreality about your own life. If you are nodding across all three, this is beyond tiredness — it is a recognized occupational condition, not a personal failure. Naming it accurately matters because it changes the treatment: rest alone does not cure burnout; only load change and recovery together do.

2 A workload conversation outline

The workload conversation is necessary and preparable. Before it: document your actual load (hours, projects, the invisible work), identify specifically what needs to change (not "less work" but "these two projects reassigned, this deadline moved"), and propose solutions, not just problems. The script: "I want to do excellent work here, and my current load is unsustainable — here is what I am carrying, and here is what I propose." Have it with your manager first, in writing if needed. If the response is dismissal, that is critical data about the environment, not about you. You cannot recover in a system that requires the pace that broke you — sometimes the conversation's real outcome is clarity that the system will not change.

3 When professional care may help

Professional care is warranted when: exhaustion persists despite real rest and load changes, you feel detached from people you love, physical symptoms continue, or you are using substances to cope. A therapist experienced with burnout helps with more than venting — they work on the patterns that led here (the over-functioning, the boundary collapse, the identity fused to output). A doctor rules out medical contributors (thyroid, depression, sleep disorders can mimic or accompany burnout). Seeking help is not dramatic; it is what you would advise anyone you care about. Burnout lies and says you should be able to handle this alone. That is the burnout talking, not the truth.