Your result

Easy to be around (27–35 points)

Your answers suggest a good balance of warmth, interest, and respect. People likely feel that there is room for them around you.

Try this next

Keep your warmth genuine by pairing it with boundaries; being likeable does not require pleasing everyone.

Your practical guide

A strengths report on the qualities that already make people feel welcomed, respected, and heard around you.

1 Your most likeable qualities

People like being around you because you probably do a few things naturally: you make others feel interesting rather than performing interestingness yourself, you remember details from past conversations, and your mood does not require managing. These are the quiet superpowers of likeability — they make people feel at ease instead of impressed. Lean into them deliberately. Keep a mental (or actual) note of one detail per important person — the job interview, the kid's recital, the marathon training — and ask about it next time. Being remembered is one of the most likeable experiences a person can have, and you are already good at creating it.

2 How boundaries protect genuine warmth

Your warmth is an asset worth protecting, which means boundaries are part of likeability, not the opposite of it. The risk at your level: saying yes to every plan, absorbing everyone's problems, and then going quiet from exhaustion — which people misread as you pulling away. Practice the warm no: "I would love to, but I need a quiet weekend — can we do next week?" It preserves both the relationship and your energy. Also watch for the listener trap: if every conversation becomes their venting session, gently rebalance with "I want to hear this — and I also want to tell you about my week." Mutuality keeps warmth sustainable.

3 Using curiosity without overextending

Curiosity is your engine — keep it, but aim it. Instead of scattering attention across every person and topic, go deeper with fewer: one thoughtful follow-up beats five surface questions. Try the "second question" rule — after someone answers, ask one more question about their answer before sharing your own story. It makes people feel genuinely heard rather than merely conversed with. And notice your own fuel gauge: curiosity fades when you are depleted, so protect sleep, solitude, and whatever restores you. You do not owe the room your energy at all times; a curious person who sometimes rests is far more likeable than one running on fumes.
