Your result

Low trait pattern (0–13 points)

Your answers suggest that entitlement and admiration-seeking are not dominant patterns for you. Everyone has blind spots, so keep making room for feedback.

Your practical guide

A balanced guide to maintaining empathy and humility while watching for ordinary blind spots.

1 Strengths that protect mutuality

Your low-trait pattern is protected by specific strengths — name them so you can keep them. You likely tolerate being wrong without collapsing, feel genuine pleasure at others' success, apologize without managing the narrative, and let other people be the expert sometimes. These are not default human settings; they are achievements, often built through good modeling or hard experience. The way to protect them is noticing when they are under load: exhaustion, humiliation, and high-stakes competition are the conditions that tempt everyone toward self-protection. Your pattern is not fragility-free — it is well-maintained. Maintenance is the whole game from here.

2 How status pressure can change anyone

Status pressure changes everyone, and understanding the mechanism keeps you honest. When admiration, rank, or winning is on the line — the promotion race, social media metrics, being the smartest person in the room — the brain starts treating image as survival. Watch for the subtle shifts: name-dropping, steering conversations toward your wins, feeling irritated rather than happy for a peer's success, curating your struggles out of existence. None of these make you narcissistic; they make you human in a status-saturated culture. The antidote is deliberate counter-practice: celebrate someone else's win out loud, admit a mistake publicly, let someone else shine without narrating your role in it.

3 A private accountability check

Run a private accountability check monthly — not from shame, but from stewardship of a good pattern. Three questions, answered in writing: Whose feelings did I consider this month besides my own? When was I last wrong about something important, and how did I handle it? Is there anyone who finds it hard to be honest with me, and why? If the answers come easily, your pattern is healthy. If a question stings, follow the sting — that is where growth lives. Consider also asking one trusted person annually: "Do I make room for you, or do I take up the room?" Their answer is data, not a verdict. People with genuinely low traits are the ones still checking.
