

YOUR FULL REPORT

Does your partner show narcissistic traits?

Your safety and autonomy matter

Score band: 36–45 points · Relationships

What this report covers

A safety-centered guide for frequent fear, isolation, reality distortion, punishment, or coercive control.

Inside:

1. Warning signs that matter most
2. Safer ways to seek confidential support
3. Why confrontation may not be the first step

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

Your safety and autonomy matter (36–45 points)

Frequent punishment, reality distortion, isolation, threats, or fear can signal emotional abuse. A quiz cannot tell you what to do, and confronting a controlling partner may increase risk.

Try this next

If you feel unsafe, seek confidential domestic-violence support from a safe device and make decisions at your pace.

Your practical guide

A safety-centered guide for frequent fear, isolation, reality distortion, punishment, or coercive control.

1 Warning signs that matter most

The warning signs that matter most are the ones affecting your safety and autonomy: punishment for disagreeing, reality distortion that makes you doubt your memory, isolation from friends and family, threats (to you, themselves, the children, or your security), monitoring your movements or communications, and fear — if you feel afraid of your partner, that alone is significant. A quiz cannot diagnose your relationship, but frequent patterns like these can signal emotional abuse, and emotional abuse is still abuse. Trust the fear; it is information, not overreaction. You deserve to take this seriously even if they say you are overreacting — especially then.

2 Safer ways to seek confidential support

Reach out from safety: use a device they do not monitor, clear your browsing if needed, and contact a domestic-violence hotline or local resource — confidential, free, and experienced with exactly this. In the US, the National Domestic Violence Hotline (1-800-799-7233, or text START to 88788) helps people at every stage, including those who are not ready to leave. A counselor experienced with abusive dynamics can help you think clearly without pressure. Tell one trusted person the real situation. You do not need to have a plan to deserve support; support is how plans get made. Your safety and your pace both matter.

3 Why confrontation may not be the first step

Confrontation — presenting the label, demanding change, issuing ultimatums — is often not the safest first step with these patterns. It can trigger escalation, more sophisticated manipulation, or retaliation, while rarely producing genuine change. That does not mean permanent silence; it means sequencing: safety planning and outside support first, any confrontation later and ideally with professional guidance. Focus your energy on your clarity, your resources, and your options rather than on getting them to admit what they are. You cannot argue someone into empathy they do not have. What you can do is protect yourself, and that is not giving up — it is the bravest, most practical thing available.