

YOUR FULL REPORT

Does your partner show narcissistic traits?

A harmful pattern may be present

Score band: 27–35 points · Relationships

What this report covers

A support and clarity guide for repeated invalidation, entitlement, or manipulation in your relationship.

Inside:

1. Naming what is happening
2. Protecting your perspective and support network
3. Planning choices without pressure

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

A harmful pattern may be present (27–35 points)

Your answers suggest repeated invalidation, entitlement, or manipulation. Whether or not narcissism explains it, the effect on you matters.

Try this next

Talk privately with someone trustworthy or a qualified counselor who will focus on your safety and choices.

Your practical guide

A support and clarity guide for repeated invalidation, entitlement, or manipulation in your relationship.

1 Naming what is happening

Naming what is happening — to yourself first — is often the hardest step. Say it plainly in private: the invalidation, the entitlement, the manipulation, the way conflict always ends with you apologizing. You do not need certainty about labels or diagnoses; you need honesty about effects. "Whether or not this has a name, I am being harmed" is a complete and sufficient basis for action. Many people stay stuck at this stage for years, minimizing ("it is not that bad") or contextualizing ("he had a hard childhood"). Context explains; it does not obligate you to endure. Your experience is data, and you are allowed to trust it.

2 Protecting your perspective and support network

Protect your perspective and your support network deliberately, because these dynamics corrode both. Counter reality distortion with your documentation and with one trusted person who hears the unedited version — a friend, sibling, or counselor who will reflect back what is actually happening. Resist isolation actively: maintain your friendships even when it causes friction, keep your own money access and important documents, nurture one part of life that is entirely yours. If you find yourself rehearsing conversations, managing their moods preemptively, or feeling crazy — those are symptoms of the dynamic, not flaws in you. Outside perspective is not disloyalty; it is oxygen.

3 Planning choices without pressure

Plan your choices without pressure — from them or from well-meaning others. You do not have to decide everything today; you need options and time. Quietly gather practical information: your financial picture, housing alternatives, legal basics in your state, supportive contacts. Consult a counselor or domestic-violence resource confidentially — from a safe device — even if you are not sure it "counts" as abuse; they help people at every stage, including "I am just trying to understand." There is no required timeline and no required outcome. The goal is that whatever you choose — stay with boundaries, separate, or wait — it is your choice, made with clear eyes.