

YOUR FULL REPORT

Are you being a bad friend?

A steady friend

Score band: 0–13 points · Relationships

What this report covers

A friendship strengths guide for protecting the reliability, honesty, and mutual care you already offer.

Inside:

1. What friends can count on from you
2. How to stay present within real limits
3. A friendship maintenance rhythm

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

A steady friend (0–13 points)

You show signs of mutuality: you care, follow through, and repair. The goal is not perfect availability; it is honesty and consistency.

Try this next

Tell a friend one specific thing you value about them.

Your practical guide

A friendship strengths guide for protecting the reliability, honesty, and mutual care you already offer.

1 What friends can count on from you

Friends can count on you for the things that actually matter: you show up when it counts, you tell the truth kindly, and your care does not evaporate when life gets busy. That reliability is the foundation everything else is built on — people forgive a late reply from someone they trust far faster than punctuality from someone they do not. Take inventory of your specific strengths: are you the friend who remembers the hard dates, the one who gives honest advice, the one who just sits there when sitting there is the job? Knowing your friendship style lets you lean into it instead of apologizing for not being a different kind of friend.

2 How to stay present within real limits

Steadiness does not require unlimited availability — it requires honesty about your limits. The friends who last are not the ones who never say no; they are the ones whose no is clear and kind. Practice capacity language: "I cannot do Saturday, but I can do a call Thursday" beats a vague "maybe" that slowly becomes a no. When you are in a depleted season — new baby, hard quarter at work, your own struggles — say so once, briefly: "I am running on fumes lately, so I may be quieter, but I am here." People extend enormous grace to honesty and almost none to unexplained distance.

3 A friendship maintenance rhythm

Friendships, like gardens, need a maintenance rhythm — small, regular, unglamorous. Build yours around three touchpoints: a quick check-in text every week or two to one friend ("thinking of you, how is the new job?"), a real plan monthly with someone who matters, and one annual gesture with weight — showing up for the hard thing, remembering the anniversary, the long letter. Put the monthly plan on your calendar like any appointment; "we should hang out sometime" is where friendships go to fade. This rhythm is not performative — it is how you make sure the people you love feel loved, not just known.