Your result

Mostly accountable (0–13 points)

Your answers suggest that you usually make room for other people's feelings and take responsibility when needed. Keep noticing your impact, not just your intent.

Try this next

Ask one trusted person: 'Is there a habit of mine that makes honesty harder with me?'

Your practical guide

A strengths-first guide to protecting the accountability and empathy you already show.

1 Your strongest relationship habits

Your answers suggest accountability is already a habit, not a performance. You likely listen when someone says you hurt them, resist the urge to recruit allies in a disagreement, and keep your private behavior consistent with your public standards. That steadiness is rare: most people defend first and reflect later, if ever. Notice the specific moments that prove it — the apology you gave without a "but," the boundary you respected even though you disliked it, the time you celebrated someone without competing. Naming these moments matters, because strengths you can name are strengths you keep. Your work now is protection: stress, exhaustion, and feeling criticized are the conditions that erode good habits first.

2 Blind spots that can still surface under pressure

Even accountable people have a pressure point — a situation where old defenses wake up. Yours most likely appears when you feel criticized in front of others, when someone you love seems disappointed, or when you are running on empty. Watch for the early signals: a flash of heat before you respond, the urge to list what the other person did wrong, rehearsing your defense while they are still talking. These are not character flaws; they are alarm bells. The moment you notice one, buy yourself sixty seconds — water, a breath, a short walk — before you answer. People remember how you handled the hard thirty seconds far longer than they remember the disagreement itself.

3 A 7-day accountability check-in

For the next seven days, run one small daily check. Each evening, ask: did anyone have to work around my mood today? Did I listen fully at least once without planning my reply? Did my actions match the standards I expect from others? Write one honest sentence per question — no essay, no self-grading. If you spot a miss, repair it within 24 hours with a specific message: what you did, how it landed, and what you will do differently. End the week by asking one trusted person, "Is there a habit of mine that makes honesty harder with you?" Then just listen. Maintenance like this is what keeps a good pattern from quietly drifting.
