Your practical guide

A work-fit profile for people motivated by mastery, precision, and useful systems.

1 Your strongest work conditions

Your strongest work conditions are probably specific: deep focus without constant interruption, clear expectations and well-defined problems, time to think before responding, and mastery over novelty. You likely do your best work in the second hour of uninterrupted concentration, not in the brainstorm. Honor this by design, not apology: block focus time visibly on your calendar, choose roles with depth over breadth, and negotiate for the conditions you need as standard equipment, not special favors. The modern workplace rewards the loud and the fast, but the deep work that actually moves things forward is usually done by people like you. Build your career around that truth.

2 Roles that reward depth

Roles that reward depth share a shape: expertise that compounds, problems that reward sustained attention, and quality standards that matter. Think specialized engineering, research, data analysis, skilled trades, writing and editing, accounting, medicine's diagnostic side, craftsmanship of any kind. When evaluating a role, ask: does mastery here get more valuable over time, or does the job reset every quarter? Do the best people in this role go deep or go wide? You want the first of each pair. Also favor environments that protect focus — smaller teams, async-friendly cultures, managers who measure output rather than presence. Depth is your competitive advantage; choose arenas where it counts.

3 Interview questions that reveal fit

In interviews, ask the questions that reveal whether your depth will be fed or starved. "What does a typical week look like — how much uninterrupted time do people get?" "How is expertise recognized here versus visibility?" "What is the hardest problem someone in this role solved recently?" Listen for specifics versus platitudes: "we value deep work" means nothing; "no meetings before noon on Tuesdays and Thursdays" means everything. Also ask about the last person who thrived in the role and what made them successful — if the answer describes a glad-handing generalist, this may not be your arena. You are interviewing them as much as they are interviewing you.
