

YOUR FULL REPORT

Are you the coworker nobody likes?

A few habits may grate

Score band: 14–26 points · Career

What this report covers

A focused reset for small habits that may be annoying coworkers more than you realize.

Inside:

1. Which answers raised your score
2. How your intent may be landing
3. Three low-effort behavior swaps

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

A few habits may grate (14–26 points)

Some behaviors may be landing more sharply than you intend, especially under stress or time pressure.

Try this next

Pick the answer that would annoy you most in someone else and change that habit first.

Your practical guide

A focused reset for small habits that may be annoying coworkers more than you realize.

1 Which answers raised your score

Go back to your answers and find the ones that raised your score — they are the map. Common culprits at this level: chronic lateness that others plan around, dominating conversations, negativity that drains meetings, inconsistency between what you say and do, or being sharp under stress. Pick the top two, not all of them; two fixed behaviors transform a reputation, while a ten-item self-improvement plan transforms nothing. For each, write the specific moment it last happened — the meeting, the comment, the missed deadline. Vague self-knowledge ("I can be difficult") changes nothing; specific memory ("I cut off Jamal twice on Tuesday") is actionable.

2 How your intent may be landing

Intent and impact diverge most at work, because colleagues cannot see your reasons — only your behavior. You may have intended efficiency when you sent the terse email; they received coldness. You meant focus when you skipped the small talk; they read arrogance. You were stressed, not angry — but they planned their week around your mood. The fix is translation: add the five words that reveal intent ("quick note so we stay on track:" before the terse email), narrate the neutral ("heads down on the deadline today, not ignoring anyone"), and check impact directly ("did that land okay?"). You do not need a new personality; you need subtitles for the one you have.

3 Three low-effort behavior swaps

Three low-effort swaps with outsized returns. One: replace "no" with "yes, if" — "yes, I can do that if we push the report to Friday" turns obstruction into collaboration. Two: arrive two minutes early instead of five late — punctuality is the cheapest respect signal in professional life. Three: end one interaction per day with appreciation — "thanks for flagging that," "good catch in the meeting." None require talent or time; all compound. Run all three for thirty days and then ask a trusted colleague if they have noticed anything different. Small, visible, consistent — that is the entire formula for reputation repair at this level.