Concerning moments (14–26 points)

Some behaviors may leave you minimized or off balance. Avoid getting stuck on a label; describe specific actions and their effects.

Try this next

Write down one recurring interaction in plain facts: what happened, what was said, and how it ended.

Your practical guide

A reality-based guide for examining concerning moments without getting trapped in proving a label.

1 Behavior versus diagnosis

Separate behavior from diagnosis — it protects your clarity. You do not need the word "narcissist" to act; you need specific, observable behaviors: "he mocked my cooking in front of his friends twice this month" is actionable, "he is a narcissist" is a debate. Labels invite endless argument about definitions; behaviors invite decisions. Also note the pattern question: is this a bad month or a bad dynamic? Stress makes everyone worse temporarily. What matters is the baseline across six months and whether the behavior responds to direct feedback. Write the behaviors down factually — the list itself will tell you what you are dealing with.

2 Documenting patterns clearly

Document patterns clearly, for yourself first. Keep dated notes: what happened, what was said (quotes when possible), who else was present, how it ended. This is not about building a court case — it is about countering the reality distortion that often accompanies these dynamics, where you start doubting your own memory. Review monthly: is the frequency rising? Are apologies followed by change or by repetition? Are you editing yourself more — smaller opinions, fewer friends, careful wording? The documentation habit also prepares you for any future conversation with a counselor, friend, or attorney. Clarity is your first form of protection.

3 How to test whether repair is genuine

Test whether repair is genuine with a small, clear request — not a trap, a test. Name one specific behavior and ask for one specific change: "When I am speaking, please do not interrupt — can you work on that?" Then watch for sixty days. Genuine repair: they acknowledge it, you see effort, slip-ups come with unprompted acknowledgment. Performative repair: defensiveness, promises with no change, improvement that lasts two weeks, or turning it back on you ("you interrupt too"). One failed test is information; a pattern of failed tests is an answer. You are not required to keep administering tests indefinitely — at some point, the results are in.
