

YOUR FULL REPORT

Do you hate your job?

Your fit is slipping

Score band: 14–26 points · Career

What this report covers

A fit check for the parts of work that no longer match your values, strengths, or needs.

Inside:

1. Your biggest points of friction
2. What may be negotiable
3. Signals it is time to search

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

Your fit is slipping (14–26 points)

Several parts of the job are costing more than they give back. Before making a dramatic move, identify which conditions are negotiable.

Try this next

List what needs to change, what you can influence, and what only a new job can solve.

Your practical guide

A fit check for the parts of work that no longer match your values, strengths, or needs.

1 Your biggest points of friction

Friction has addresses — find yours. The usual suspects: the work itself (bored or overwhelmed by the actual tasks), the people (a manager who drains you, team dynamics that grate), the structure (pay, hours, commute, inflexibility), or the meaning (you cannot connect the work to anything you care about). Rank them for your situation. This matters because each has a different fix: task friction might be solved by a role tweak, people friction by a team change, structure friction by negotiation, meaning friction almost never by anything except a different direction. Most people misdiagnose meaning friction as laziness and try productivity hacks. Name the real address first.

2 What may be negotiable

Separate the negotiable from the fixed before you decide anything. Negotiable often includes: schedule, remote days, specific responsibilities, project assignments, title and pay (yes, even now), professional development support. Fixed usually includes: the company's core business, its culture at the top, the fundamental nature of the role. Have the negotiation conversation before the exit conversation — with specifics, not ultimatums. "I would stay and thrive if we could adjust X and Y" gives a good manager something to work with. If they cannot move on anything that matters, you have learned something definitive, and leaving becomes a decision instead of an escape.

3 Signals it is time to search

Watch for the signals that searching has become the right move: you have tried real changes and the dread persists; Sunday evenings feel like grief; you are fantasizing about getting fired so the decision gets made for you; your health or relationships are absorbing the cost. When two or more are true, start the quiet search — not a dramatic quit, a deliberate exploration. Update the resume, tell two trusted people you are looking, set a weekly application quota you can sustain. Searching while employed is a position of strength: you can be picky, negotiate, and choose. The goal is not to flee; it is to move toward something better on purpose.