

YOUR FULL REPORT

Does your partner show narcissistic traits?

Mostly mutual

Score band: 0–13 points · Relationships

What this report covers

A relationship strengths guide for protecting mutual respect, separate identities, and safe disagreement.

Inside:

1. What healthy mutuality looks like here
2. Keeping boundaries clear
3. How to notice repair, not perfection

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

Mostly mutual (0–13 points)

Your answers suggest room for both people's needs, perspectives, and boundaries. A healthy relationship still has conflict; what matters is repair and freedom from fear.

Try this next

Keep naming needs directly and noticing whether respect remains during disagreement.

Your practical guide

A relationship strengths guide for protecting mutual respect, separate identities, and safe disagreement.

1 What healthy mutuality looks like here

Healthy mutuality has a recognizable texture: you can disagree without fear, say no without punishment, have bad days without being managed, and maintain friendships without suspicion. Needs flow both directions — yours are asked about, not just accommodated when convenient — and repair after conflict is mutual rather than one-sided. If this describes your relationship, trust that read; not every difficult moment is a red flag, and healthy relationships still include selfish days and clumsy fights. Your result suggests the foundation is sound. The work now is maintenance: keep noticing, keep speaking, and do not let comfort turn into complacency about the small things.

2 Keeping boundaries clear

Boundaries stay clear through calm repetition, not dramatic declarations. The structure that works: name the specific behavior ("when you raise your voice"), state your limit ("I need us to pause"), and follow through every time — consistency is what makes boundaries real. Avoid the trap of over-explaining or justifying; "I am not okay with that" is a complete sentence. Also protect the boundaries that are easiest to surrender quietly: your friendships, your money decisions, your alone time. In healthy relationships, boundaries are respected with mild annoyance at most — never with rage, mockery, or punishment. That distinction is worth remembering.

3 How to notice repair, not perfection

Judge repair, not perfection. After a conflict, healthy repair looks like: they bring it up without being forced, they name their part specifically, their behavior actually changes, and the same fight does not recur monthly. What does not count: grand gestures that skip accountability, apologies that evaporate under stress, or improvement that lasts exactly until you relax. Keep a mental ledger over months, not days — patterns are the truth, incidents are weather. And extend the same standard to yourself: mutuality means you repair too. A relationship where both people own their part, imperfectly and repeatedly, is the real definition of healthy.