

YOUR FULL REPORT

Do you have toxic habits?

Strain is showing

Score band: 27–35 points · Personality

What this report covers

A focused repair plan for patterns that may be leaving other people unheard or emotionally off balance.

Inside:

1. The behaviors most likely to strain trust
2. A clean-apology and follow-through plan
3. Boundaries that make conflict safer for everyone

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

Strain is showing (27–35 points)

Several patterns here may make relationships feel one-sided or emotionally unpredictable. The best next step is not shame; it is clear ownership and consistent repair.

Try this next

Practice one clean apology: name the behavior, name its impact, and say what you will do differently.

Your practical guide

A focused repair plan for patterns that may be leaving other people unheard or emotionally off balance.

1 The behaviors most likely to strain trust

At this level, trust usually frays in a handful of repeat behaviors. The most common: bringing up old mistakes to win new arguments, using silence or withdrawn affection as punishment, making cutting jokes and calling the other person too sensitive, and expecting understanding for your behavior while judging others harshly for theirs. Each one teaches people the same lesson — that honesty with you is expensive. Pick the single behavior from your answers that made you most uncomfortable and treat it as the priority. You do not need to fix everything this month; you need to stop the one pattern that costs the most, visibly and consistently.

2 A clean-apology and follow-through plan

Choose one relationship where strain is showing and run a two-week repair. Week one: one clean apology for a specific recent behavior — name what you did, name its impact, state what changes, no "but," no request for forgiveness. Week two: follow-through they can observe without being told about it. If you apologized for weaponizing old mistakes, then in the next disagreement, stay on the current issue even when losing the point feels terrible. Tell them once, briefly, what you are working on — "I am practicing not bringing up the past in arguments" — then let the behavior speak. Consistency over weeks is the only evidence people trust.

3 Boundaries that make conflict safer for everyone

Boundaries make conflict safer for everyone, including you. Agree on three rules you will both honor: no name-calling, threats, or humiliation, ever; either person can call a 30-minute pause, and the conversation resumes at a set time rather than dissolving; old issues stay out of new arguments unless they are directly relevant. Write them down together when things are calm. These are not punishments — they are guardrails that keep a disagreement from becoming damage. If you cannot hold these three, that is important information, not failure: it means the next section matters more than you hoped.