Your result

Hard to read (0–13 points)

You may come across as distant, distracted, or critical even when that is not your intent. Likeability is not about performing—it grows from helping people feel safe and noticed.

In your next conversation, ask one genuine follow-up before sharing your own experience.

Your practical guide

A clear plan for becoming easier to read without performing, people-pleasing, or pretending to be outgoing.

1 Signals others may be missing

Being hard to read is not the same as being cold — but other people cannot tell the difference. The signals you are likely under-sending: visible enjoyment (smiling when you are actually having fun), verbal warmth ("I am glad you are here" instead of just showing up), and curiosity signals like follow-up questions. You may feel plenty inside while your face files no report. Try an experiment this week: in three conversations, say one warm thing out loud that you would normally only think — "that is a great story," "I have missed talking to you." Watch what happens. Most people respond to expressed warmth instantly, and you will learn how little it takes.

2 Three warmth habits to practice

Three habits reliably make people feel liked, and none require becoming an extrovert. First, use names: "Thanks, Marcus" lands warmer than a generic thanks, because it says you noticed the person. Second, ask one follow-up question per conversation — not an interrogation, just "how did that go?" after someone mentions something. It signals that you listened and that they matter. Third, end interactions warmly: "Good seeing you" with eye contact beats a mumbled goodbye. Practice them in low-stakes settings first — cashiers, coworkers, acquaintances — where the cost of awkwardness is zero and the reps build fast.

3 How to show interest while staying yourself

You do not need to perform outgoingness; you need to translate yourself. Think of warmth as subtitles for who you already are. If you are a good listener, add the visible cues — nodding, "mm-hm," a brief reaction — so people can tell you are engaged. If you care about people, say so occasionally and specifically: "You give great advice" beats a vague "you are awesome." Keep your natural style — quiet people who show interest are often the most magnetic in a room. The goal is not to become someone else at parties; it is to make sure the warmth you feel on the inside has at least one reliable exit.
