

YOUR FULL REPORT

Are you controlling?

A serious control pattern

Score band: 36–45 points · Relationships

What this report covers

A serious accountability guide for coercive patterns involving fear, punishment, isolation, or resources.

Inside:

1. Safety-critical behaviors
2. Why intent does not erase impact
3. Specialized support and long-term change

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

A serious control pattern (36–45 points)

Several behaviors here can cross into coercion or abuse, especially threats, surveillance, isolation, or control of money. Accountability and professional support are important.

Try this next

If anyone may be unsafe, prioritize distance and safety over a confrontation. Seek a qualified abuse-intervention or mental health resource.

Your practical guide

A serious accountability guide for coercive patterns involving fear, punishment, isolation, or resources.

1 Safety-critical behaviors

At this intensity, we need to name what is happening plainly: threats, surveillance, isolation from friends and family, control of money, intimidation, or using fear to win arguments can constitute coercive control or abuse — regardless of your intent, your stress, or your own history of being controlled. "I only do it because I love them" and "I am not as bad as..." do not change the impact. If anyone may be unsafe right now, their safety comes before your self-improvement project: do not confront, do not demand a conversation about your quiz result, and do not use this insight as leverage. Distance and safety first, always.

2 Why intent does not erase impact

Intent does not erase impact — this is the sentence everything else depends on. You may genuinely love the person, genuinely feel out of control yourself, genuinely be repeating what was done to you. All of that can be true, and the behavior is still harmful, and it is still your responsibility to stop it. The trap to avoid is turning your own pain into the main story: "I act this way because I was hurt" asks the harmed person to comfort their harmer. Your history deserves its own healing, in its own space, with a professional — not as an explanation delivered to the person you have been controlling. Both things matter; they do not cancel each other.

3 Specialized support and long-term change

Long-term change at this level needs specialized support, not just willpower and good intentions. Look for a therapist experienced with controlling or abusive behavior patterns, or a certified intervention program (often called batterer intervention or abuse intervention programs) — these are structured, accountability-focused, and far more effective than general counseling for this pattern. Change is measured in months and years of consistent behavior, verified by the people affected, not by your own sense of progress. Starting is courageous. Staying — through discomfort, through setbacks, through the slow work of becoming safe to be close to — is the real commitment.