Your result

Your nervous system may be carrying a lot (27–35 points)

Your answers suggest that past stress may be shaping current reactions, trust, or daily functioning. You deserve support without having to prove that it was 'bad enough.'

Try this next

Consider a trauma-informed therapist or counselor who lets you set the pace and does not push disclosure.

Your practical guide

A compassionate plan for nervous-system patterns that may be affecting trust, sleep, focus, or daily life.

1 How past stress may show up now

Past stress may be showing up in your present through channels you have not connected: disproportionate reactions to small triggers, emotional numbness in situations that should feel good, difficulty trusting even safe people, body symptoms with no clear medical cause, or a persistent sense of threat in safe environments. The connection is not always obvious — the argument that ruins your week might be echoing an older helplessness. Start noticing with curiosity rather than judgment: when a reaction feels bigger than the situation, ask gently, "when have I felt this before?" Recognition is not reliving; it is the first step toward the past losing its vote on your present.

2 Reducing overwhelm in the moment

For overwhelm in the moment, work with your body first — reasoning comes back online after regulation, not before. The 3-minute reset: slow your exhale (in for 4, out for 6-8), press your feet firmly into the floor and notice the pressure, name five things you can see in detail. If you are flooded, add cold — water on the face or holding ice — which activates the dive reflex and slows your heart rate. If you are shut down and numb, add gentle movement or warmth instead. Practice these when you are calm so they are available when you are not. Overwhelm is a state, not a verdict; states pass, especially when you have tools.

3 Finding trauma-informed care

Finding trauma-informed care means looking for specific signals: practitioners who mention trauma-informed, EMDR, somatic experiencing, or complex trauma; who emphasize that you set the pace; who do not push detailed disclosure early. Good first questions: "How do you work with someone who gets overwhelmed talking about the past?" and "What does a first session look like?" Many offer free consultations — use them to check fit, because the relationship is the treatment. If cost is a barrier, community mental health centers, Open Path Collective, and training clinics offer reduced fees. You deserve support that understands trauma; generic advice can inadvertently make it worse.
