

YOUR FULL REPORT

Do you have toxic habits?

A strong pattern to address

Score band: 36–45 points · Personality

What this report covers

A direct, shame-free accountability plan for frequent patterns that can seriously damage trust and safety.

Inside:

1. What must stop first
2. How to make amends without demanding forgiveness
3. When professional or group support can help

→ Full details for each section on page 2

Your result

A strong pattern to address (36–45 points)

Your answers point to frequent behaviors that can erode trust. Change is possible, but insight alone is not enough—support from a therapist or skills-based group could help you practice safer ways to handle conflict.

Try this next

Start with one non-negotiable: no threats, humiliation, retaliation, or punishment during disagreements.

Your practical guide

A direct, shame-free accountability plan for frequent patterns that can seriously damage trust and safety.

1 What must stop first

Change starts with a non-negotiable list, and it starts today, not after more reflection. During any disagreement: no threats, no humiliation, no mocking, no bringing up the past to win, no silent treatment or withdrawn affection as punishment, no retaliation afterward. These are not communication styles to improve gradually; they are behaviors that actively harm people, and every additional instance deepens the damage. If you feel one rising, leave the room before you speak — a slammed door you apologize for is still better than words you cannot take back. Tell the people closest to you, plainly, that you are stopping these specific behaviors, so they can hold you to it.

2 How to make amends without demanding forgiveness

Amends are about the other person's healing, not your relief. For each significant harm, the structure is: name exactly what you did, acknowledge the impact it likely had, state what you are doing to change, and do not ask for forgiveness or a response. "I used money and silence to control decisions. That must have felt trapping. I am starting therapy and I will not do it again" — then stop. Some people will not forgive you, and that is their right; demanding absolution turns the apology into another pressure tactic. Expect repair to take months of consistent behavior, not one good conversation. Track your own follow-through privately so you are not relying on them to monitor you.

3 When professional or group support can help

Patterns at this intensity rarely shift on willpower alone, and that is not a moral verdict — it is how entrenched behavior works. A therapist experienced with harmful relationship patterns, or a structured group such as an accountability or anger-management program, gives you what insight cannot: practice, feedback, and someone who will not accept your polished version of events. Look for help that focuses on behavior change and impact, not just self-esteem. If cost is a barrier, community mental health centers and sliding-scale practices exist in most areas. Starting is the bravest part; the people around you have been waiting for this version of the effort.